Group Play Therapy for Preschoolers Exposed to Domestic Violence

Alissa Huth-Bocks, M.A.,^{1,2,3} Allison Schettini, M.A.,¹ and Valerie Shebroe, Ph.D.¹

Domestic violence is a relatively common problem that has serious, negative consequences for preschoolers' emotional, behavioral, and interpersonal functioning. Many children who witness domestic violence also experience the loss of a caregiver, which can exacerbate difficulties. Unfortunately, only a small number of preschoolers receive treatment for these problems, possibly because there are few well-developed programs for this age group. This paper describes a group play therapy for preschoolers exposed to domestic violence and other traumas. The group is designed for 14 sessions, each lasting 60 minutes, and takes place in a Head Start preschool. Individual sessions follow a consistent format; the group begins with a warm-up exercise about feelings, followed by structured activities, and ends with unstructured free play and clean-up. General techniques used in the group and their therapeutic uses are described. Recommendations for future groups and future research on the efficacy of groups are also discussed.

Violence against women is now considered to be an important public health problem for women and their children. Browne (1993) reported that between 21% and 34% of women in this country will be physically attacked by an intimate partner during their lifetime. In addition, approximately 3.3 million children live in homes with domestic violence, putting them at high risk for witnessing violence against their mothers (Carlson, 1984). In fact, a more recent report indicated that
